“What is English to you?
University students’ attitudes to L2 English”

Raum 40528, Geiwi-Turm

Abstract

For young people in Europe today, English is no longer a foreign language in the traditional sense, but rather an additional language with which they come into contact while still learning their first language and one they interact with daily, especially if they choose to study English at the university level. This workshop will engage students in thinking about their own rapport with English and will report the results of an extensive online survey among students at the Faculty of Arts, University of Ljubljana, Slovenia. This is part of a developing project to investigate when and to what extent young people use English and what their attitudes towards English and their L1(s) are.
