

user name: L [REDACTED]
E-mail: [REDACTED] 13@gmx.at

Starting time: 11:32
Finishing time: 12:18
Number of words: 235

Posted: February 18, 11:35 AM by L [REDACTED]

I completely agree with Angi Silverston. There are too less females in senior position in big companies. I also think it is really great that there are people like Mrs. Silverston who helps women (and supports). But I also understand the position from workingman's point of view. It is also not ok to give women a good job only because of the fact. Like he said, he worked really hard, and in this case the employer should be fair and give the job to someone who is really good at it, no matter if these person is a man or a women.

It should not be a disadvantage to be male. Maybe also women need more help and support in there working life because they are a lower number and there are a lot more men, especially in big business companies.

So it is good that there are people who strengthen these self confidence.

In my opinion, the bosses should be more neutral and should take the person who has the properties which fit the best.

A way to ensure fairness could be, that the applications are without names and send it this way to the companies. So the bosses have only to decide because of there skills.

Another way could be to give the candidates some tasks to do and decide afterwards who did it better.

Everyone should get the chance to get there dreamjob.