The Russian invasion of Ukraine has taken most of public opinion in Europe by surprise. The general puzzlement is a mixture of astonishment for the return of forms of organized violence that were thought to be definitively overcome in the Old Continent and uncertainty about the real causes of the conflict. The impression, in fact, is that the military confrontation is traversed by a series of invisible frontiers that are not only as important as the state borders, but are also one of the main objectives of the propaganda that has made the Russian-Ukrainian war, if possible, more ruthless than modern wars usually are.

In her seminar, Professor Stoeckl will try to shed light in particular on the invisible frontiers that demarcate the complex religious landscape not only of Russia and Ukraine, but of the entire Orthodox Christianity, and intersect society, politics, and culture at multiple points.
