

DiSlaw (Didaktik slawischer Sprachen) is an international open access online journal that follows the Open Access Policy of the University of Innsbruck. The articles published in DiSlaw are therefore freely accessible and available, as the founders of the journal are convinced that free access to knowledge does not only serve the progress of scientific research, but is also conducive to continuous exchange with in-service teachers. The journal therefore does not charge any fees for the publication of the articles or for their access.

Information for authors

As part of the submission procedure, authors are requested to consider the following requirements and to confirm them by submitting their contributions and signing the authors' agreement. In case of non-compliance, the contributions cannot be accepted.

- The contribution is yet unpublished and has not been submitted for publication in any other journal, anthology, etc. (otherwise, the editors have to be informed of this at the time of submission). Please note that you may continue to freely exploit your contribution after it has been accepted by and published in DiSlaw, as long as you refer to its initial publication in DiSlaw.
- For each contribution, an abstract must be written in English and in another language / in the language of the contribution (see stylesheet).
- Abstracts and contributions are to be provided in Word and sent to the following address: redaktion-DiSlaw-Slawistik@uibk.ac.at.
- The abstracts and contributions each undergo a "double blind" peer review process. Any references to the identity of the authors are removed by the editors and replaced, for example, by author 1.
- The text of the contributions complies with the guidelines of the stylesheet and the Word template, respectively.
- For both academic articles and best practice contributions, we recommend the use of the Creative Commons licence CC-BY. The authors retain the copyright to their contributions, but transfer the right for first publication to DiSlaw. Contributions published in DiSlaw may be freely used by others under certain conditions.¹ The use of another CC licence (e.g. CC-BY-ND) or the reservation of all rights without granting a licence is only permitted for academic contributions and must be communicated to the editors in writing at the time of submission. Best practice contributions (CC-BY) may be further processed and used for teaching purposes provided that the author is named.
- The chosen CC licence applies exclusively to the submitted text. DiSlaw points out that for any other included (audio)visuals such as images, photos, videos, graphs, etc. all rights are reserved. Otherwise, the authors must explicitly state what licence the included (audio)visuals have been granted. The rights of use and image rights, respectively as well as the selected licence always need to be indicated in the respective (image) caption.
- In the event of an infringement of the rights of third parties, the University of Innsbruck shall be indemnified and held free from loss and against any claims lodged against it by a third party. This applies in particular to copyrights and personal rights of third parties and extends for the duration of the statutory copyright or the respective rights of third parties.
- The authors allow the University of Innsbruck to make their electronically submitted contributions available free of charge in one of its repositories (e.g. DiSlaw website) as well as for long-term archiving.

¹ Any use and/or modification of the licensed material must include the name of the author, a rights and licence notice, a disclaimer and a link to the material. This also means, for example, that authors may republish their contributions in anthologies or as chapters of a book, provided they credit the first publication in DiSlaw. Authors also have the right to republish their contributions as a preprint on their institution's website, on their personal homepage or in an archive of their choice before the final publication in DiSlaw, provided that the original publication on DiSlaw is always cited. DiSlaw actively encourages authors to promote the dissemination of their contributions and thereby enhance the international reputation of the journal.